The picture depicts someone in power, possibly a politician, influential as well as fierce, directing the masses towards some other group, with fake propositions making their entire speech no better than some poison. With ~~the~~ the masses swirling in emotional confusion, such people take all the advantage they can while making promises of a future they don't even see.

With the emergence of social platforms like Twitter, it has become quite easy to observe people who thrive off negative emotions, usually hatred. These people, in their attempt to move some mob, don't even provide actual facts, and instead of thriving in the negative attention that they themselves get in being a mediator. The false accusations such people throw, fully knowing what it can do to someone's career and mental health ~~is~~ <sup>are</sup> honestly astounding. While it used to be limited to influential people spreading some propaganda, with the surge of traffic to online platforms, even a general nobody gets to spread their own propaganda, and where sometimes it can be good for a victim, it is generally a medium to direct your own ~~hate~~ <sup>hatred</sup> towards someone else.
